Background information:

The Community Ownership Support Service \(COSS\), delivered by the Development Trusts Association Scotland, is funded by the Scottish Government to support local authorities, other public bodies and communities in the sustainable transfer of assets into community ownership. This adviser-led service covers Scotland, providing a range of services for communities from one-to-one advice at every stage of the asset transfer process, access to Expert Help, networking and training opportunities and access to a comprehensive web resource. The support provided to public bodies includes providing information and feedback on asset transfer processes, facilitating cross departmental meetings and providing ongoing CPD workshops on community ownership.

With the enactment of the Community Empowerment (Scotland) Act 2015 and the Land Reform (Scotland) Act 2016, community ownership is increasingly being recognised as a powerful tool in developing strong, independent and resilient communities. This was particularly true during COVID where asset owning community anchor organisations were seen to have played a key role in the resilience of their communities throughout the pandemic.

With tightening public spending the opportunities to take on publicly and privately owned assets has never been greater. Community ownership and management of assets is not however without its challenges. There is a real need to support community groups through the asset transfer/ acquisition process from forming appropriate governance structures, building their capacity and crucially developing sustainable operating models that will support their facilities into the future.

The COSS team comes from a wide range of backgrounds including community development, training and development, business and regeneration. For this post we are happy to consider applicants with experience of community development or business development and/ or finance; either as an adviser or with practical experience of developing community enterprises.
